Roger Haskell was baptized on March 6, 1614, in Charlton Musgrove, Somerset, England. In 1635, he journeyed to the New World with his family: his brother and sister, William and Joan, his mother, Elinor, and his stepfather, John Stone. Accompanying them were possibly two sons from John Stone's previous marriage. The family settled in the Bass River area of Salem, Massachusetts, now known as Beverly.

In late 1636 or early 1637, Roger was granted 20 acres of land in Salem, on the Bass River side, as recorded in the Town Records of Salem (1634–1659). On December 25, 1637, the town distributed marsh and meadowlands according to household size.

Roger, living alone at the time, received a half-acre. Over the years, he continued to acquire additional land, steadily increasing his holdings.

Around 1639, Roger married Elizabeth Hardy, the daughter of John Hardy. In his 1652 will, John Hardy bequeathed all his land near the Bass River, a 50-acre parcel granted by the town of Salem, to his son-in-law Roger, further cementing Roger's presence and prosperity in the area.

Roger served his community in various capacities. He was a jury member in 1655, 1662, and 1664 and was elected Constable of the Bass River side of Salem in 1657 and 1658. His duties as constable brought him before the court on multiple occasions, reflecting his active role in the civic life of early Salem.

The following account of one of Roger Haskell's court trials, entitled "The Roger Haskell Foibles," was written by John F. Regan and first appeared in Issue 51 of the Haskell Journal in 1999.

Roger Haskell lived in Salem/Beverly, Massachusetts, and was fated for trouble. A man named Jonathan Porter sold some land to Osmand Trask. When Porter conveyed the land to Trask pursuant to the sale, Porter's wife, Eunice, did not sign the deed. How this happened is not revealed.

Soon after the sale was completed, Jonathan Porter, the seller, died. The troubles then began. Eunice Porter secured Roger Haskell's services as her representative. There probably were no attorneys available so early—1660. Roger Haskell filed suit against Trask for Eunice, asserting that since Eunice did not sign the deed, she still had a dower interest in the transferred land. The matter came to trial.

Trask presented evidence that Eunice knew all about the sale and promoted the sale. Oddly, Trask's principal witness was "Ellin Stone, the wife of John Stone," and she was Roger Haskell's mother. When the evidence was complete, the judge made his decision. The important thing, he concluded, was that Eunice did not sign the deed. How she felt about the sale was irrelevant. He appointed three men to set off one-third of the land to Eunice as her dower interest.

One expects that hard feelings were aroused in Osmand Trask against Roger Haskell. The trial occurred in 1660, and the following year—1661, a clay pit controversy arose between Osmand Trask and Roger Haskell. Fires were dangerous in those days, and the settlers built their wood chimneys and lined them with clay to make them fireproof. This required a special kind of clay, which was probably scarce. A clay pit near Roger Haskell's house produced the desired type of clay. The pit had no private operator, and apparently, anyone who wished to have clay got it from the pit.

Roger Haskell's house appears to have been located at one of the corners of his land, set back a distance from the road in front of it. The road was not heavily traveled and may not have been an official road at all. A private lane led from the road to Roger's house and his outbuildings. This lane was close to the edge of Roger's land and near the clay pit. The clay pit was so close to the lane that an "old fence," which seems to have separated the land from the pit, had fallen into the pit and disappeared. The pit was owned by "William Wodberie and Widow Brane," but neither seems to have taken any interest in the pit or in anything that happened regarding it.

One day in 1661, Osmand Trask, needing clay, hitched a couple of oxen to a cart and came to the pit, which was 38 feet wide, 66 feet long, and 6 feet deep.

There may have been a ramp leading down into the pit, for Trask had driven his team into the pit and started loading clay onto the cart. Roger Haskell had become much concerned about the effect the removal of clay from the pit was having on his lane. He customarily drove livestock along the land with no lights at night. After the sun went down, Roger and others traveling the lane faced the danger of falling into the pit.

Trask, already angry with Haskell, was probably digging clay that day on the lane side of the pit. Haskell saw what Trask was doing, went to the pit's edge, and told Trask to stop digging. Several others were around: Roger's son, William, who was 15 years old, was there, and Elizabeth Thorndike, 20 years old, was visiting the Haskell's. She was in the house looking out a broken window (the pane may have been oil paper). John Saffal was walking along the road headed for Salem. William and John Dodge (father and son) and William's servant, John Harris, all of Salem, were nearby. William Dodge's son, William, Jr., was married to Roger Haskell's daughter. Somehow, Roger Haskell got into the pit, and a fight started between Haskell and Trask.

At a resulting trial, Elizabeth Thorndike said she saw Trask hold up his spade and make for Haskell "two or three times." Young William Haskell testified his father told him to go down "to the lower side of Trask's oxen," which he did, and that he saw Trask strike his father and that his father then "took up a pitchfork," at which point Trask grabbed his father "by the neckcloth." When they heard the altercation, William Dodge, his son, John, his servant John Harris, and William Fiske came on the run. John Dodge said he pulled Haskell off Trask and asked him if he "would kill the man." John Harris said nothing in his testimony about Trask hitting Haskell (this probably happened before he arrived) but said that Haskell hit Trask on the head and shoulders twice with a pitchfork, which caused Trask to holler.

George Emory, who must have been a doctor, testified

that, after the fight, Trask was “distempered in his body” and that he “had let said Trask’s blood.” Philip Fowler and his wife related that when they visited the Haskell family on an evening, they felt that they and their horse were in danger of falling into the pit.

Roger Haskell, testifying on his own behalf, became quite indignant. He said, “he had a right to his own land.” He pointed out the dangerousness of the pit. As for the road in front of his house being a public highway, he said he “would like to know how those who said it was a highway knew it to be so as he had enjoyed it longer than some of them had known their right hand from their left.” He said Trask did not need the clay because Trask “had a great deal at his own door.”

When all the evidence was in, the court found Haskell guilty of hitting Trask and fined him, though the fine amount was not recorded.

Roger Haskell was about 47 years old at the time of the dispute, and Osmand Trask was about 34. The feud between the two continued. Haskell seems to have done surveying, and at least twice, Trask haled him into court for removing a landmark. One such charge was dismissed as unproven, and Haskell confessed to the second charge.

Roger Haskell died in 1667, aged 53 years. In 1668, his widow, Elizabeth (Hardy) Haskell, married Edward Berry. In his will, Roger Haskell devised 80 acres of land for his sons, John and William Haskell, who promptly sold the land to Nicholas Woodberry. Roger’s will had yet to be probated at the time of the sale. Roger did not own the 80 acres and had no right or power to devise it to anyone. Elizabeth Hardy Haskell owned the 80 acres. It had probably been owned by Elizabeth’s father, John Hardy, a Salem fisherman, who died in 1652, and this land passed to his wife, also named Elizabeth. Upon her death in 1654, it went to Elizabeth (Hardy) Haskell.

The re-married Elizabeth (Hardy) Haskell Berry had two choices, and all involved realized this. One, she could claim the land as her own. She was entirely within her rights to do this, but if she did, she would probably have to disclaim anything Roger Haskell had given her in his will, not being able to pick and choose among the provisions of his will. Also, if she claimed and established ownership of the 80 acres when she died, the property would likely go to her new husband, Edward Berry. Her second choice was to probate the will, not contest it in any way, and accept any benefits the will gave her. Under the law, this would stop her from ever claiming the 80 acres and would ratify Roger’s devise of the land to the sons and the sale of the land to Woodberry. Elizabeth did not know what to do, so she held the will and did nothing.

At this point, Roger’s brother, William Haskell, entered the matter. He was anxious for the benefit of the land to stay with the Haskell family and had no confidence in Elizabeth’s new husband, Edward Berry. William, with a man named Samuel Gardner, went to see Elizabeth. Perhaps Edward Berry was away at the time of the visit. They discussed the situation with Elizabeth, and she assured them that she freely gave up her right to the land, wanted her sons to have the land, and did not want her husband to have it. She had yet to undertake to probate the will.

William Haskell set about to persuade Elizabeth to probate the will. She later said that “he remained with me most of the time, night and day, using many arguments and provocations with me, to have me go to that court to have the will proved when I was full of trouble and knew not what I did....and I abided by his advice.” Included in William’s arguments, according to Elizabeth, were “will you give away your estate to such a husband that saith that you are a baud?” (note: a prostitute) and such like provocations, including

“If he recovers the land, he will sell it, make a bag of money on it, and show you a light pair of heels.” One wonders where Edward Berry was during these discussions.

Elizabeth finally probated the will. She changed her mind later, probably under pressure from her husband, Edward Berry. She went into court and admitted to the judge what she had done but asserted, “Sir, but I have considered since; I had done myself wrong in speaking that word, which was not the truth, for I do protest before God that I never gave free consent to Roger Haskell’s will, which was my former husband.” The judge told her that her protest was too late.

One cannot help but be skeptical about the two sons, John Haskell and William Haskell, who were devised the 80 acres and sold it before the will was probated. John Haskell, one discovers, got into other complications when he proposed to a girl, Martha Proctor, jilted her, and married Patience Soule, whose father, George Soule, signed the Mayflower Covenant and came to Massachusetts on the Mayflower. Martha Proctor’s father was incensed at John Haskell’s conduct and sued him on behalf of his daughter, resulting in some judgment against John Haskell.

While the Haskell family, or some of the Haskell family, did not trust Edward Berry, the latter manifested at least the appearance of trusting his stepson, Mark Haskell, when he deeded his house and other property to Mark, inserting in the deed a provision that Mark must keep Berry for the rest of Berry’s life and provide Berry with the necessities of life. Before doing this, Berry must have talked the matter over with Mark, with Elizabeth (Hardy) Haskell Berry (Mark’s mother), Berry’s wife, and with Mark’s wife. Perhaps Berry felt his working days were over. Presumably, Mark agreed to the undertaking set forth on the deed. Incidentally, the house that Berry deeded to Mark was only part of a house. Frequently, different portions of a house were owned by various people. The part of the house Berry owned was described as commencing at the end of the house closest to the meeting house and extending back into the house as far as the chimney, which was probably in the middle of the house.

So ends this story as told in volumes 2-6 of the Records and Files of the Quarterly Courts of Essex County, Massachusetts, published by Essex Institute, Salem, Massachusetts, 1912-1917. It is also interesting to read testimony concerning the fact that William Haskell raised the children of Roger Haskell; Edward Berry refused to do so, which is recounted in volume 6, pages 242-4.
